Spinal cord ischaemia may occur after thoracic aortic aneurysm rupture. The presenting symptoms and radiological findings may be non-specific and may mimic a thoracic spinal cord tumour. Early diagnosis and treatment of spinal cord ischaemia is important, as it may lead to devastating neurological sequelae. We describe a case of a patient with a thoracic aortic aneurysm who presented with radiculopathy and myelopathy, who was found to have associated aorto-oesophageal fistula. Aorto-oesophageal fistula formation is a rare complication of aortic dissection, with only one other case reported in the literature. Aorto-oesophageal fistula is a life-threatening condition, and early diagnosis and treatment is of vital importance. This invention relates to a transformer and, more particularly, to an improved transformer construction utilizing a housing that insulates a primary winding, a secondary winding and a core thereof from any water or moisture in the surrounding atmosphere.
